Personal Statement: I have lectured in the University of Sierra Leone for 15 years with broad experience ranging from directing to supervising undergraduate and post graduate research in diverse fields of study. I am keen on investigating health systems financing models and developing measures to assess service user economic burden through the pathway of care in low socioeconomic settings. While services may be provided by government, private sector, donor agencies, NGOs or a combination of all, estimating the true cost through health care pathway has been an elusive area for low resources settings where health insurance is usually not available and people rely on out of pocket payment or free services. In Sierra Leone the policy environment is at a rudimentary level for most health services. The lack of proper cost makes it challenging for managers and service planners to forecast and cost health interventions. Thus, specific studies are required to understand how service cost is estimated and how critical cost corners can be identified and address prior to service implementation. Further, this will assist in identifying key cost barriers to health services and guide government intervention accordingly. My PhD focus hope to address this and contribute to the development of sustainable health policies and interventions.
