

ACADEMIC INFO

Kemoh qualified as registered nurse, adults in 1997 and gained in-patient and out-patient experiences in acute medical nursing and STIs/HIV/AIDS before taking up lecturer positions. He received his PhD in Public Health at City, University of London, where he was guest lecturer, which he did alongside clinical practice.

He then took up a fulltime position as senior lecturer in Adult Nursing and Public Health with Anglia Ruskin University in 2010. He had recurrent positions of course leader and admissions tutor for BSc Public Health. He taught and lead modules on the MSc Public Health programmes and supervised several PhD theses. Also taught cohorts of international nurses including those on adaptation programmes.

Kemoh was Associate Professor in Nursing Sciences with University of East Anglia, Norwich and organised, lead, and taught a series of nursing modules at undergraduate and postgraduate levels (please see below for details). He also supervised several ProfDoc students.

He is currently Associate Professor and Head of Department, Public Health with Njala University, Department of Environmental Health Sciences, School of Health Sciences where he is involved with teaching and leading courses on the BSc Nursing, BSc Public Health, MSC Public Health programs and PhD teaching and supervision.

His main research interests have included concordance to medications and the experiences of couples and individuals living with discordant chronic infections (STI/HIV) (where only one partner is infected), using grounded theory methodology and Interpretive Phenomenology informed by pragmatism and symbolic interactionism as theoretical frameworks.
